the nation's thanks, and ask no more save to stay in peace. They have had justice done them-more than one had who had scant justice done may be that they, too, have found out ere w that there he ought to be. The nation has been just to him, who, in such wild times as the world had not seen for full three hundred years, did his duty secording with his light, and died in doing it; and his sad, noble face looks down on nen as they go by, not with reproac but rather with content. Content, I say, and peace. Peace from their toil, and peace with their fellow-man. Obdormiseum in pace. They have fallen asleep it, peace. The galled shoulder is freed from the collar at last. The brave old by the health officer were submitted and approved. Adjourned. nire. There are no more mistakes now, no more cores, no more falls, and no more whip—thank God—laid on too often when it was least needed and most felt. And there are no more quarrois, world of which the abbey is to me a symbol and a acrament. Pitt and Fox, Warren Hastings and Iscaulay—they can afferd to be near to each other in the abbey, for they understand each other now elsewhere, and the Romish abbott's hours do not stir in their grave beside those of in the south aisle of Henry VII.'s chapel lies in royal pomp she who so long was Britain's bane, that exquisite personage, the daughter of debate, poor Henry Queen of Scotz. English and Scotz alike have forgotten the stream of noble blood she cost their nations, and look sadly and pityingly upon her effigy. Why not?

And in the corresponding sisle upon the north, in a like tomb—which the vaice of the chagish people demanded from James I., the son of Mary Stuart—lies even a sadder figure still, the poor Queen Elizabeth. To her indeed, in her last days, vanity of vanities, all was vanity. Trytone's rebellion killed her. "This trutt have I of all the labors which I have taken under the sun," and with a whole book of Ecclesiastics written on her mighty heart, the old crowned licenses of England couled herself up in her latr, refused food and died, and find her place heaceforth. The word have since the word her would have since he fishe could, and whom she had at last to elay, in obedience to the voice of laggland. They have made up that distarrel now. Ay, and that tomb is the sacred symbol of a reconciliation even more pathetic and more strange. Eligabeth lies, menuingly by her own desire, in

Mr. Merrick. That is plenty of time for us on so narrow a question as that.

Mr. Christie. I would ask whether we would be under an obligation to consume all that time. The Chairman. Not the least in the world. We will expect at the clees of that argument, after consultation, then to determine what subpenass we will issue, and to set a day for the hearing on this charge. We would like to be informed day after to-morrow whether the Roard of Public Works would file an answer to this or go into the hearing without an answer.

Mr. Harrington, It will take some time for the counsel to examine these charges. We have had no opportunity of course of looking at them thus far. for the Chairman. If you deare further time of course you shall have it.

Mr. Harrington. We do not propose to take any more time than is absolutely necessary.

The Chairman. We are very anxious, indeed, to get through. You see, this investigation keeps as out of our places in both Houses, and we are very anxious to complete it at the very earliest possible moment.

oment. Mr. Harrington. The committee cannot be more an answer.

Mr. Mattingly. I see very redily, on hearing the charges read with the specificatins, that there are a number of statements that are facts. We will, of course, save any necessity of introducing proof in regard to them by admitting such to be
